• mezcal • 2 ounce pour

all tequilas are mezcal, but not all mezcals are tequila. does that clear it up?

didn't think so! in mexico, mezcal is a generic term for any spirit distilled from the starchy bulb of the agave plant. if that agave is the blue weber, and grown in jalisco or one of four neighboring states, the spirit distilled from it gets to be called tequila. the pinas for tequila are slow baked in above ground ovens to break down the starches to sugars before crushing and extraction of the agave. for mezcal the pinas are roasted in charcoal-heated pits in the ground before they are crushed to extract the agave nectar for fermentation and distillation. the result has roughly the same relationship to tequila that islay malts do to other single-malt scotches:
