especially beneficial after a good meal. the careful balance of the aromatic herbs and alcohol give these meal enders their soothing digestive properties. a great way to kick start your digestive process and replenish your well being.

• amaro • 1oz. pour amari (the plural of amaro, the italian word for "bitter") are a class of bitter italian liqueurs principally employed for their digestive qualities after a meal

each amaro is different, and there are hundreds. amaro is traditionally made by infusing grape brandy with a (usually secret) mix of herbs, flowers, aromatic bark, citrus peel and spices, a blend that can include anything from cardamom and artichoke to elderberry flowers. then it's sweetened with sugar syrup and aged, sometimes for years. it's silky, like a liqueur; bitter and sweet in varying degrees; aromatically complex; and, as far as perrone's is concerned, both delicious and fascinating.

• absinthe • 1 oz. pour

there's something romantic about absinthe — that naturally green liquor derived from wormwood and herbs like anise or fennel. vincent van gogh and oscar wilde drank it. henri de toulouse-lautrec and pablo picasso filled the glasses of cafe patrons with absinthe in their paintings. absinthe was a drink of aesthetes.

first, the absinthe is mixed with cold water poured over a sugar cube. not only does this dilute a liquor that is often bottled at about 50-70% abv down to 12%-15% abv. it also produces a cloudy effect called "le louche" (roughly translated to "the clouding"). "le louche" is a spectacle for the eyes, as the absinthe transforms to a milky, iridescent shade. it is a bit of magic in a glass.

"exercise makes you look and feel good naked... so does tequila, your choice!"

• mezcal • 2 oz pour all tequilas are mezcal, but not all mezcals are tequila. does that clear it up?

didn't think so! in mexico, mezcal is a generic term for any spirit distilled from the starchy bulb of the agave plant. if that agave is the blue weber, and grown in jalisco or one of the other four neighboring states, the spirit distilled from it gets to be called tequila. the pinas for tequila are slow baked in above ground ovens to break down the starches to sugars before crushing and extraction of the agave. for mezcal the pinas are roasted in charcoal-heated pits in the ground before they are crushed to extract the agave nectar for fermentation and distillation. the result has roughly the same relationship to tequila that islay malts do to other single-malt scotches: smoky!
